Meeting Notes:

The group met on Zoom at 3:30.

David created documents that held groups 2 and 3's user stories. Everyone began by taking time to open and read through these documents.

Once this was completed, we had a discussion on the format of the user stories. As a group, we agreed that group 2 did a wonderful job identifying key concepts and complaints from the videos and provided many necessary, thoughtful questions for each point. Additionally, they used the correct user story format in all their examples. The only thing we decided could have been better was the number of user stories they finalized. They went into incredible detail, however, there were only three user stories. So, there were still concepts from the "We Dig Holes" team that were not uncovered as user stories.

Additionally, we agreed that group 3 also went into incredible detail, yet did not identify any user stories. Their paper was formatted by giving a bullet point summarizing a fact or need from the video, followed by bullet points with related questions. While this format provides the reader with information that can be returned to the company regarding their needs and introduces clarifying questions, it is not organized as user stories.

After bringing these points and others to the discussion, Sean typed up our evaluations while Abby took meeting notes.

Finally, we decided as a group that we prefer group 2's user stories. While the quantity is not too large, the quality is exactly what a team would look for. Sean also typed this section for us.

As reviewing and making last-minute edits to our evaluations, we downloaded the documents and Abby let the group know she would finish up meeting notes and email them once she was done.

Meeting adjourned around 4:10.
